However, there should be no surprise here. Adobe added the new Presets store so that we could more easily apply filters and styles to our pictures. It is true that some people do not like the design of the Presets Finder, but I have found it quite a convenient and reliable tool. What is more, the new Preset window is actually very similar to the previous one. It is a quite simple window that lists all available Preset categories and allows us to apply updates to the current pictures. One thing, though: it seems that users cannot apply more than 5 presets at once. Fortunately, most of the popular filters are available there, so you will not experience that problem too often. It is unfortunate that Adobe did not add a way to browse the Presets, similar to the previous version, as that proved quite handy. Of course, with the release of CS5, Adobe re-released the Lightroom part of the application for CS5, so that you can use it and upgrade to the new features in the same version of Lightroom. Unlike before, the process of upgrading is much more convenient, as it utilizes a so-called Merge window, which is a new feature of Lightroom in CS5. In version 5 of Lightroom, we got auto-incremental backup, although not really a full one. You can now select the default folder to which you want to back up all of your images, but you are not allowed to select any other folder. That's really annoying, as you cannot also copy your pictures into that folder for backup purposes. In addition, the program uses a database that does not store any settings in plain text files. That makes me feel insecure to some extent, for it could be possible to corrupt the database and lose all of your settings. Adobe has a folder called Lightroom.

However, for the most part, photo editing on either a PC or a Mac can be accomplished with the proper software and tools. The best way to see this is to build an image on your computer and then save it as a JPEG. Then, open that JPEG on your smartphone and judge how well it's rendered. e3d0a04c9c
