Google Releases Chrome 69 Beta Update with Stable Release.Q: C# MVC (ASP.NET) Code That Gets Re-Run At Times When the IIS (or Application?) Restarts In our ASP.NET app, I have a SQL Server database that runs on SQL Azure. One of our controllers goes and gets some data off the database. This works fine, except when the server restarts. Then the code for that controller no longer works because the connection string is no longer valid. I have a sticky cookie mechanism that once the user is authenticated, I pass the database connection string as a value to the cookie. When the user returns, I clear the cookie (this also ensures that the user doesn't have to log in each time). The problem is, even though the cookie is removed, the database connection string is still around, and the controller continues to work, and now the user can't connect to the database. If the user logs back in, the controller breaks because the connection string is no longer valid (of course the database connection string is changed when I set the cookie). What I would like to do is re-run the code in my controller that gets the connection string from the database when the server restarts. If that logic
